to be no need for no one to be contrary when there's flowers an' such like, an' such lots o' friendly wild things runnin' about makin' homes for themselves, or buildin' nests an' singin' an' whistling, does there?

Mary, kneeling by him holding the seeds, looked at him and stopped frowning.

'Dickon,' she said. 'You are as nice as Martha, you were. I like you, and you make the fifth person. I never thought I should like five people.'

Dickon sat up on his heels as Martha did when she was polishing the grate. He did look funny and delightful, Mary thought, with his round blue eyes and red cheeks and happy-looking turned-up nose.

'Only five folks as tha' likes?' he said. 'What is th' other four?'

'Your mother and Martha,' Mary checked the names on her fingers, 'and the robin and Ben Weatherstaff.'

Dickon laughed, so that he was obliged to stifle the sound by putting his arm over his mouth.

'I know tha' thinks I'm a queer lad,' he said, 'but I think tha' art th' queerest little lass I ever saw.'

Then Mary did a strange thing. She leaned forward and asked him a question she had never dreamed of asking anyone before. And she tried to ask it in Yorkshire because that was his language, and in India a native was always pleased if you knew his speech.

'Does tha' like me?' she said.

'Eh!' he answered heartily, 'that I does. I likes thee wonderful, an' so does th' robin, I do believe!'

'That's two, then,' said Mary. 'That's two for me.'

And then they began to work harder than ever and more joyful. Mary was startled and sorry when she heard the clock in the courtyard strike the hour of her midd'night dinner.

'I shall have to go,' she said mournfully. 'And you will have to go too, won't you?'

Dickon grinned.

'My dinner's easy to carry about with me,' he said. 'Mother always lets me put a bit o' somethin' in my pocket.'

He picked up his coat from the grass and brought out of a pocket a tiny little bundle tied up in a quite clean, coarse, blue and white handkerchief. It held two thick pieces of bread with a slice of something laid between

'It's often aught but bread,' he said, 'but I've got a fine slice o' ham on with it today.'

Mary thought it looked a queer dinner, but he seemed ready to enjoy it.

'Run on an' get th' other meals,' he said. 'I'll be done with mine first. I'll get some of the work done before I start back home.'

He sat down with his back against a tree.

'I'll call th' robin up,' he said, 'and give him th' rind o' th' bacon to peck at. They likes th' fat wonderful.'

A high-angle, wide shot of a woman standing in a large, modern library. She is wearing a light-colored dress, a wide-brimmed straw hat, and white sneakers. She is holding a book and has a small brown bag slung over her shoulder. The library features curved, white bookshelves filled with books, arranged in a circular pattern around a central wooden floor. The ceiling is white with a circular pattern of recessed lighting.
